

"Do you get it?"

Leisure

Everyone looks forward to a vacation. It is the reasoning of anticipation that varies from person to person.

I love to go on vacation. For me, it is a chance to put my life back into perspective, to validate all the time and effort I put into my career. For many, sadly, it is a break from their lives. So many people do something during the work week only to generate an income. There are few who have a passion for what they do and look forward every day to going to their chosen place of 'employment'. For those people, a vacation is a break from something they dislike, an escape from a 'necessary evil', a hiatus from 'same thing, different day'. The longer the break can be, the better. I think of how horrible it must be to go day-to-day waiting for the next chance to 'get away'. For me, vacation is a necessary part of growth. It allows me to put into perspective what I do in my life. It enhances my desire to do what it is I do and increases my urge to return to doing it. I love what I do.

The most satisfying part of what I do is seeing the changes that occur in people's lives. My 'job' is to give people the greatest possibility of achieving what they are here to do. We all have a purpose. Many search their whole life to find what it is. Some find it, many do not. Unhappy employees are unhappy people who become unhealthy people. My simple answer is to 'do what you love'. Find what it is that you would do if money was not an issue. Then find some way you can do it and money will not be an issue. Next, do what it takes to ensure that the expression of your thought is precise, unaltered and undiminished. Get adjusted. Have complete innate transmission. Then relax as hard as you work.

A vacation then becomes a way of refreshing your brain for improving your 'job'; to recharge your passion; to improve your focus. A 'job' is not a part of your life. It is the foundation of your life. It is the support of your purpose.
